CELIBACY FOR OTHERS' SAKE

Some bachelors are of the sterilized variety—a sort of imitation manhood; some become bachelors by the common consent of womankind, and some of their own volition. In the first instance the human race is to be congratulated; in the second instance, the intuition of the female species reaches its highest plane; and in the case of the self-willed bachelor we would hate to tell you what some of the insufficiently urged maiden ladies think of them. But we have in mind the bachelor who denies himself marriage for religious, and unselfish, and patriotic service to others. The last is manhood at its peak, and worthy of our highest praise.

While married life is normal and ordained of the gods, celibacy of an intentional sort has much to commend it, and no one of sound judgment will condemn or ridicule it in either sex. It doesn't infer that either party is unromantic, or unattractive to the other sex. It simply means that certain obligations and vicarious ideals are paramount, and assume an importance superior to one's own personal desires. "Cheers for Miss Bishop", a recent movie, exemplifies these ideas quite well.

Certain kinds of professions make married life impracticable. Those that are dangerous, those that live in travelling bags, and many jobs that exhaust all of one's time and physical energies are among them. Even the great St. Paul observed that married men are primarily concerned with pleasing their wives, while a single Christian could concentrate more completely on the pursuit of his high calling in character research.

A group of Catholic children, enjoying some forbidden pleasures, may illustrate our thought. Seeing a priest at a distance, they suddenly put on an act of good behavior. Discovering on closer observation that it was an Episcopalian clergyman, one of the crowd expressed his disgust by piping up, "That ain't no Father. That fellow is married and has a lot of kids!"

The ascetic life has its compensations and its rewards. Barbara's engagement lasted a long time, but at last her honor bound obligations and pleasures were discharged and she lived happily ever after. Chas. Donkin, lacking a family of his own, became an understanding friend, a father and a pal to a multitude of boys. He saved his life and happiness by losing his life for others. He became not weary in well-doing or in the courage of his convictions, and eventually reached the height of his profession.

We will let the philosophy of the bachelor born be as they will. But, alas for us, we ate too many apples in the Garden of Eden before we acquired his ideals. We wouldn't for a moment deny ourselves of the fascinating companionship of our feminine friends. We wouldn't tell any "Chris" or "Rosemary" or even "Buttons" to get behind us because their sex had a certain Satanic flavor. No indeed, with all the manhood at our command, we extend these lovely creatures an invitation to come around and see our line and hear our line. We are unselfish in allowing our bachelor friends to enjoy all the ideals of single blessedness, but as for ourselves, we will keep our ideals high by the inspiration of your charming selves. Just say, "Hello, Pop! How are you, old boy?", and the College Inn world, unto the half of our Kingdom, is yours.
